ANTHONY'S SPORTS CORNER

The Arizona Cardinals lost against the Houston Texans 40-20 this past Sunday. Their record for the season so far is 3-11. Unfortunately, recent losses have eliminated the Cardinals from the playoffs.

There are three more weeks of the regular season left. The playoffs will start January 10. The Kansas City Chiefs have been eliminated from the playoffs for the first time in 10 years. This will be the first playoff series in 25 years that there will not be Brady, Manning or Mahomes in the playoffs. The era has ended.

Super Bowl LX will be played on February 8 in Levis Stadium in Santa Clara, California which is home to the San Francisco 49ers.

The Phoenix Suns are in 7th place in the Western Conference with a record of 14-12.

In the NHL, the Vegas Golden Knights are in 1st place in the Pacific Division of the Western Conference with a record of 16-6.

The College Football National Championship playoffs begin on December 19 with the top 12 teams competing. The National Football Championship game will be held on January 19 in Miami. The quarterback of Indiana Hoosiers, Fernando Mendoza won the 2025 Heisman Trophy, which was well deserved. My prediction for the National Championship will be Indiana University.

The college basketball top five: Coming in at #5 is UCONN with a record of 10-1. Iowa State is coming in at #4 with a record of 11-0, Duke is #3 with a record of 10-0, Michigan is #2. The #1 team is in our state; Arizona is #1 with a record of 9-0. This is going to be good year in basketball.

As always, you can watch your favorite sports events at Anthony's Fisherman's Landing Bar. Until the next issue, keep watching sports my friends

FROM THE COM BOARD

GEOLOGIST AT LARGE- Distinctive rock formations

By Luis Vega

There are many distinctive rock formations in Mohave County. The pioneers saw these formations and it reminded them of animals, people or other things so they named the formations for their appearance. The naming might not have anything to do with geology but the reason the formation appears the way it does, does.

Possibly one of the most famous formations is Elephant's Tooth near the town of Oatman. Sitting on the edge of an eroded caldera, this area has a complicated geologic history including a huge volcanic eruption that spewed large volumes of volcanic debris into the air and depositing volcanic tuffs and flows. These were then intruded by renewed activity that formed rhyolitic dikes, stocks and plugs.

One of these intrusive bodies, probably the hardened throat of a volcanic vent, formed a white colored rhyolitic rock that eroded into a white spire. I guess this white spire looked like an elephant's tooth to early pioneers so that's what they called it even though many said the proper name should've been Elephant's Tusk.

North of Oatman, next to Highway 68, is another spire of rhyolite. It is one of the most distinctive spires in the range that some call Finger Rock but the pioneers, being much more politically correct, called it Thumb Butte.

The reason these spires remain is that the surrounding rock is softer and erodes easily, leaving the straight-sided spires. Boundary Cone, south of Oatman is also an intrusive stock. It has a vertical north side and a steep south side. I am familiar with Boundary Cone because, during my Search and Rescue days, there was a rescue of a young man who fell while trying to "free climb" down the north side. We started the rescue late in the evening, lowering a rescuer using ropes, to the crack where the climber had fallen. We had to spend a very cold and windy night on the top of Boundary Cone, wedged between rocks so that we wouldn't roll off the mountain. With daylight the next morning, the DPS helicopter was able to pick the rescuer and climber safely off of the cliff. They probably didn't notice that the rhyolite was a silicic (lots of quartz) intrusion of fine-grained rhyolite.

At the northern end of the Cerbat Mountains are a distinctive looking group of rocks called the Cockscomb. Look to the east as you head to Las Vegas near Dolan Springs and you'll see a rugged looking feature on the crest of the range just to the north of Mount Tipton. This feature looks like the comb of a rooster, that rubber looking bare skin on the top of its head. These jagged rocks look completely different than the round looking metamorphic rocks to either side.

These distinctive looking rocks are of Miocene to Oligocene age - an erosional remnant of a wide spread eruption of volcanic rocks. These rocks were laid down in horizontal layers. Through geologic time, they were tilted and eroded. Ultimately, the beds were isolated as a remnant of a broader expanse of volcanic rocks at the top of a fault block mountain with the edges of the beds eroded into the jagged cliffs. Today they look out of place - jagged rocks in a mountain range of rounded metamorphic and granitic units.

Going over Coyote Pass heading toward Las Vegas is the Castlerock Bar. It gets its name from the rock formation on the ridge across the highway. The rocks are Precambrian aged granite that have eroded into a broad lower part topped by a smaller dome. The formation looks like a medieval castle so it's called Castle Rock. The popular Badger Spring hiking trail goes through the saddle uphill from Castle Rock. A manmade feature on the hillside above the bar is a rock painted white with a black nose. I have heard it's supposed to be a polar bear or a mountain goat. This is a stretch for me. If it wasn't painted, it would look like a rounded weathered granite boulder to me but then, I've never seen a polar bear in real life.

There are other distinctive rock formations in the area with colorful names that, today, aren't considered proper. Back in the day, Duval geologists renamed a distinctive rounded ridge with a black coating of iron and manganese oxides to Roper's Ridge because the pioneer's name for the ridge isn't acceptable in today's world and we wanted to honor Bill Roper, the Duval mine manager at Mineral Park. Other derogatory names still appear on USGS topographical maps - one that is near Temple Bar comes to mind. No doubt, this and others will eventually be changed.

Looking east from Highway 93 near Dolan Springs at the Cock's Comb.
